» Earnings for energy companies will ease through 2023 amid slowdown in demand

In a new report, Moody's Investors Service informs that it has changed its outlook for the Global Energy sector to stable from positive. Earnings for energy companies will ease through 2023 from record levels achieved in 2022 as the industry adjusts to a widespread slowdown in demand and rising costs. The pace of improvement in fundamental industry conditions will also decelerate after a strong post lock-down rebound in earnings and credit quality during 2021-22.

“While oil prices have declined since peak levels, restrained investment and rising uncertainty about the expansion of future supplies, plus a high geopolitical risk premium, will continue to support oil prices at levels exceeding our medium-term oil price range of $50-$70/barrel,” says Moody's Senior Vice President Elena Nadtotchi. Moody's also expects that significant dislocations in the global natural gas markets will keep natural gas prices in North America at higher levels than the agency's medium-term Henry Hub natural gas price range of $2.50-$3.50/MMBtu, supported by strong export demand for US liquefied natural gas (LNG).

With growth in cash flow moderating, oil and gas producers remain unlikely to accelerate growth investment. High cost inflation, rising cost of capital and regulatory costs will further raise return requirements and hinder growth capital investment. While disciplined about capital investment, producers have substantially increased returns to shareholders by raising dividends and buying back shares.

Refining and marketing companies will generate robust earnings in 2023, above mid-cycle levels, but combined EBITDA will decline from the extraordinary high levels achieved in 2022. Low inventories, sustained global demand for fuels and decreasing production capacity will all continue to support robust gasoline and diesel crack spreads, the main determining factor for refining margins. Finally, rising demand for oilfield services (OFS) amid some growth in drilling and completion activity will continue to boost pricing power and will support material growth in earnings for OFS companies.
